Report on Technology for Communication in English

An educator is responsible for the planning, instruction, assessment, and facilitation of any language course, leveraging technology to support language learning. Language instruction is best guided by educators rather than solely delivered via a computer program or by a non-content specialist. Research does not support the isolated use of technology for acquiring a language. Interaction with a educator is critical to building spontaneous interpersonal skills needed for real-world communication. Intercultural competence is best acquired through human interactions and meaningful experiences facilitated through a educator. Educators use content knowledge, research-informed teaching strategies, and effective technology applications to support language learning.
